Without any hesitation, teachers are professionals who like any other professionals, does their chosen career. The main difference is that teaching is the profession that molds all the other professions. As the saying goes “Teaching is a profession that teaches all other professions.” It is the main job of the teacher to teach all other would-be professionals.

Furthermore, the main job of teachers is to direct other individuals not only in the classroom but as well as with their own lives. A teacher as a person should be knowledgeable enough to comply with the needs of his/her vocation. He/she should be patient enough to adjust and wait for every learner.

A teacher must never go into the classroom without a thorough knowledge of the lesson that she will teach. And even if the students were not very active in their class, a teacher must patiently apply the art of questioning for them to cope up with the lesson.

The teacher must not only teach the subject but more importantly, she must teach values and inculcate good manners and right conduct to her students.

Brandt (1993) posited that educators have yearned to be organized as professionals for generations. Teachers give students the kind of education that is the foundation for a world-class society.

Furthermore, the teacher is prioritizing discipline and also, she must teach with passion and full determination. Teaching is said to be the noblest profession. A profession that holds the responsibility is the development of other professionals. With these titles, the teaching profession really has many responsibilities, that is why, teachers should be prepared enough to hold these responsibilities.

   An individual couldn’t become a good teacher if he does his/her job half-heartedly. Moreover, teaching is never a job for people who would just want to gain a ton of money. The pay is not that high while on the other hand, the job is very tough.

   But teachers sit on a high chair in the society. They gain a lot of respect not only from their students but as well with other people in the society.
