There are different kinds of abuse, but only some are brought to the knowledge of the public. Most especially in school, with all those students and teachers in one compound it is bound to occur. There are cases of abuse that are like cookie cutter which are usually seen on film and on TV. In a way those contents influence the occurrence of bullying in real-life setting.

Abuse does not just come in physical form. Believe it or not, there is a form of bullying and abuse that brings more damage than physical assault. Verbal abuse is the form of abuse which comes from heated words or degrading comments towards an individual. Verbal abuse happens a lot, more than one would think of. Although some cases were just simple and less acute than others, there are some extreme cases where in the abuse happens in front of a lot of people or with a crowd which makes the verbal assault more damaging. In school, there are instances that teachers abuse the students verbally so bad that the student refuse to go to school. It may sound harmless to call names, mock, or call someone stupid, but it leaves more wounds than what is seen. Verbal abuse, just as any other forms of abuse, scars the victim deep mentally. Abuse tends to alter the psychology of a person mainly on how they react, how they think about themselves and how they perceive the people around them. Children who suffered from abuse at a young age develop a more violent and less agreeable disposition later in life. It also reflects on how they treat people. Some victims close themselves off and shy away from people in thought that they will get hurt or that an interaction will once again lead to abuse. In others cases the victim acts up. They redirect their vengeance towards other people which come out as rude or even cruel in extremity. That is why words and phrases... that can be considered as verbal abuse should be strictly prohibited within the school especially from teachers. Teachers are supposed to be the ones that guide the students to the correct path and not deter them for life. It should also be published so that the public knows the damage of simple words can do to someone.
