It is wise to take education for students want to land into a decent and stable job in the future. It is wiser if students take the board examination and grab license to become full-pledged professionals. But placing them in this constricted world with your diploma and license is not just all about being wise and being wiser. Those are still not enough. Let us not forget how to stir ourselves to be the wisest.

Nowadays, there is an existence of a large group of educated and licensed professionals but unluckily they are hopeless to be employed. Take note of the word “educated”. It is a morally upgrading title that everyone wishes to have. But if you let it be associated with the term “unemployed” or “underemployed”, it’s the other way around. Nobody wants to be labeled as educated but unemployed or underemployed. Some may even say that it is much better to be uneducated and unemployed rather than educated but does not even own a job or less to be extent of misfortune, lands into heck of work which is far cry to the achieved degree. Everything you had learned and studied about would all seem to be put into waste.

A potential way is to get all the leaders in business and industry to become actively involve in higher education which aims to address the mismatch problem between training and actual jobs. Furthermore, transfer the control of technical training to industry groups which are more attuned to the needs of business and industry. The needs of this sectors should be taken into consideration because it is where we rely on getting hired and having a job. The involvement of companies from the industry and their partnership to the schools provide students the bird’s eye view of opportunities that they will face after graduation. Such move will motivate students to continue pursuing their studies until they finish it. Such move will eradicate incidence of dropouts. Such will deconcentrate the oversupply of manpower in a specific profession.

Education is a critical stage of a student life since it is an acid test of what we will become in the future. In our generation today, it is not what you want that you would consider, it is what needed that matters. Why would you study even if you are aware of your uncertain life after graduation?

It is wise taking yourself to continue studying but it is not enough. It is wiser to pass the board examination but again it is not enough. With the moves and cooperation coming from the authorities in charge of the education, business and labor sectors, and the students properly assessing themselves, they can make the wisest decision for the future, to become a professional. That makes everything enough to be wise.
