Just like everyone, your student will have unique qualities that make up their individuality. Their immediate community influenced them as they’re inheritance through the family, their environment.

Each schoolchild has exceptional deal to be offered to the classroom and to the world. In the core of growing up, these distinct potentials often are clouded by the need to be accepted and to follow the crowd. The student grants to the firmness from peers and squelches all of the things that make him/her unique in order to fit in the classroom that foster self-esteem.

1. Recognize the Student’s Own Strengths in the Classroom

Find something the student tops at and emphasize this strength. For instance if the student is good at one aspect of a classroom lesson, distinguish the student for this unique strength by having him/her support other students who are fraught with this aspect of the lesson.

2. Be Precise with Commendations

Compliment students individually and let them know precisely whatever it was that they did that made you pleased of them. To be more intense in the learning classroom, a precise act of giving commendations is needed.

3. Display Your Student’s Work
Students look for approval and recognition from adults and displaying their craft is a boundless way to communicate praise, as well as provide the student with the advantage of receiving praise from others.

4. Express an Act of Respect for the Student

Forming a trusting rapport with some students takes time and patience and is not an easy task. Reliably demonstrate respect for these students, persevere, and most likely the student will eventually begin to trust you, be relaxed and more receptive to learning.

5. Be present at Student’s Extracurricular Deeds

Get to know what your students do when they are not in your classroom. It indicates that your concern outspreads beyond not only in their classroom achievements and boost self-esteem.
