We can’t deny that the world today faces a great threat in pollution, regardless of its kind, and how do we provide solution into this. Oftentimes, we will just say that the solution should come from younger generation since they are the ones to inherit the world. Currently, there’s a clamor around the globe to push forward “green education” which aims environmental sustainability while empowering the youth.

On a detailed note, while introducing the 3Rs: reduce, reuse, and recycle, it is also important to cultivate the idea on why there is a need to conduct this and how it impacts not only the nearest community but its global impact as early as formation years of the students.

It will also allow the students to know and be aware of environmental issues and its effect to the society where we live in. It is expected to give them sufficient awareness and eventually knowledge to give them the idea that a small step can go a long way such as unplugging electric appliances or even turning off the lights after use.

Post knowledge and awareness, this should now be part of one’s system which it should be a practice and have students accountable and responsible with their decisions towards their care to the environment.

Such type of education is a neo-revolution since it only takes awareness, practice and paying it forward to drive change not only to one’s life but practically everyone with life.
