The heart of education is a child, the learner. Teachers teach for their pupils. They want their pupils to become successful in their chosen career. They develop their mental, emotional, social, physical and religious values of their children. They want them to grow, be knowledgeable, creative, talented, and resourceful. Because we all know that every child has the right to quality education that will help him/her to grow and develop to the fullest abilities, capacities, and potentials. All children have the right to an education that will make them righteous individuals and become aware of living of their own world. This basic premise is at the heart of our understanding of a child-centered education. Therefore, daily interaction with children should be supported by the fundamental question------ Am I teaching and supporting all children in their growth and development across all domains, the social, physical, emotional and intellectual? Such teaching is at the heart of fundamentally and developmentally appropriate practice of the activities within an everyday routine in a classroom scenario. Consequently, we have to teach every child and be respectful of them and be accounted for and be guided of their individual uniqueness of age, gender, culture, temperament, and burning style. Children are active participants in their education and development in their behavior and attitudes. This means that they should be mentally involved and physically active in learning what they need to know and do in the future. Child centered education has been an important foundation of early childhood education, their ideas, reference, learning styles, uniqueness and interest are considered in the planning and implementation of instructional practices. In the society and the environment, general child-centered education is becoming more interested in the wholeness of a child and effort to address all of the children’s needs, not just their academic needs, but also their healthy lifestyles.
Providing children with medical immunization, nutritious food, and other medicines that they needed. Seeing all the children healthy and having a strong body, providing them a lot of attention and programs that will give them a healthy environment and a better world. Concerning for the welfare of all the children in all areas of their growth and development are evident to the public growing awareness of their basic rights. That this is indeed the essence of child-centered education.
