Work Ethics is something that employees or people struggle with in every workplace. A good work ethic is knowing the right attitude and behavior at the right time and place. People with good work ethics get farther in life and tend to be more satisfied with themselves than people that just do nothing to get the task done. To become successful in life and in one’s career, a strong work ethics is needed. We need to form good habits such as focusing, staying motivated, finishing the tasks immediately and listening to the coaches/advises of other employees create a harmonious work ethics that will impress the company.

Examples of work ethics that need to be developed in every employee are: Professionalism, Discipline, Obedient/Obeying the Company’s Rules, Effective Communication, Taking Responsibility, Accountability, Trust and Mutual Respect for the colleagues at work, Honesty, Initiative, Respect to name a few. Even though the primary aim of ethical practices are humanitarian and compassion for the employees in the company, it can also provide advantages to the organization like: competitive advantage, better staff attraction and retention, morale, reputation and legal/ regulatory reasons. This is why, the organization or company needs to invest on trainings in shaping the work ethics of every employee.

Bad work ethics on the other hand is an attitude that an employee demonstrates that shows a lack of ambition and professionalism in the workplace. Today, in our modern world, we need employees with strong work ethics… employees with high competitive spirit, determined, dedicated, honest, responsible and with an innate love for work, colleagues and company as well.
