Due to the current situation happening everywhere especially now that we are in a pandemic state caused by the COVID-19, we hear complaints on how we are going to catch up with the current norms of life. We don't know if we really do have to undergo this kind of circumstances or we just have to embrace the humanities’ fate.

We hear news here and there about the COVID-19, and its massive impact to the human life. How it significantly affected the economy, resulting to the devastating rise for hardships. Not long ago, we can talk unconcernedly to other people. We can move freely and have our day-to-day routines done without hesitations. We can earn money easily for our daily necessities. But now, frightened to get infected, we slowly paused most of our daily routines. Some stopped earning money just to be sure that their families were safe by just staying at home. We even lost our off-the-cuff communications with our friends and neighbors, scared that we may infect them if we are the so-called carriers of the virus or we might get infected if they are the carriers. This issue has brought so much weight to us physically, mentally and emotionally. How are we going to move on from this kind of disaster?

Looking on the bright side of this global crisis because of the pandemic, people learned how to be more sensitive about one another. We have become more empathic with the feelings and the actions of others towards us. We learned to embrace our fate, hoping that this event will come to its end.
