“Every learner has a different learning style and pace. Each child is unique, not only capable of learning but also capable of succeeding.” – Robert John Meehan

Just like stars in the sky, every child is unique and matchless; they seize varieties of weaknesses and strengths, they possess different attitudes and personalities that might be positive or negative in their own perspective, each one is inimitable, one of a kind and beyond compare. Such reality bite should be apprehended and grasped mostly by educators, in such be able to discern appropriate approaches suitable for each student. Some students enjoy learning a lot, they find learning an enjoyable voyage, and they are the kind of learners that are easy to handle and deal with. However, there are also students whom for idiopathic maybe modifiable or non-modifiable reasons were unable to enjoy and take pleasure in school’s activities - reading, writing, listening, or even socializing.

Most school children weren’t able to enjoy the learning bay; they lack interest or sometimes an appealing motivation to push through learning and end up either an out of school youth or a low performing student. –they are the kinds of learners that should have a vast magnitude of importance to educators. They should be the ones that should engender the senses of teachers to improve their teaching abilities and strive harder to be the best weapon for mass instruction.

A good educator should know about the law of individuality. He should never expect a student to perform the way the other one did it. He should always consider the strengths and weaknesses of each one in order to have an effective and efficient approach. An approach that suits a student’s character and individuality could lead to a higher chance of meeting educational goals, if not it’s the reverse action that would take place. So an educator, with all his might and sensibilities should deliberate and contemplate the needs of his students, inspire them to use their strengths properly or might as well turn their weaknesses into strengths through proper education.
