FUTURE THINKING IS AHEAD OF THE PRESENT MOMENT

Some people believe that planning for the future is a waste of time for students. It is more important for them to focus exclusively on the present than about the future.

As to the question of whether people should prepare for the future or concentrate on the present, because of the following reasons, I believe our students must plan for the future.

There are numerous advantages to planning for the future. To begin with, a future-oriented student has more defined goals and incentives. It is a well-known fact that students who have goals know exactly what they want, giving them greater certainty in life. The second advantage is that it motivates students to prepare for the future. In reality, the majority of students' motivation derives from their vision. Above all, a learner's growth is more sustainable when they prepare for the future. Indeed, without a plan for the future, even successful people may feel disoriented and unable to understand why they want to be successful; as a result, they may be unable to enjoy their success.

I recognize that focusing on the present moment can help to reduce distractions and temptations. This makes sense insofar as focusing on the present makes a person more organized. Having said that, planning for the future is not a waste of time because a lack of future plans can lead to irresponsible and unhealthy behavior.

Finally, I would argue that planning for the future is far more important than focusing on the present. As a result, it is recommended that students plan for their future first.
