“GAME OF LIFE"

by:
Benjamin James M. Cruz

There are tons of games everyone can play. Games for kids that can help them distinguish the difference between colors, numbers, and alphabets. Games for teens that they can play together with their friends during weekends. Games for adults that can wipe off their stress after a long day of work. And even games for the elderly that can give entertainment while they are sitting on their rocking chair. We can find varieties of games appropriate for our age and preference. Games that we can spend our time to play, and to just have fun before doing loaded of works. Games can also serve as a new world for some. A world where you can be someone you dream of being, like a princess living in a castle, a soldier fighting for his country's freedom, a superhero defeating wickedness lurking in the street, and you can even be a survivor after a zombie apocalypse. Games are enjoyable and fun. It can lighten one's gloomy mood and make everything all bright. But there is one inevitable game we all need to face, and that is reality itself. Every day is a new chance, a new life like in a game. The choice is in our hands whether to continue or to give up.

For some families, eating three times a day is a great challenge they need to face. They must make sure that every plate at the dinner table has a portion of food for their children. No one must have less, but no one should also have more. Because the meal they prepared is just enough for the number of their family. Daily basic needs are prioritized first before the wants of each family member. Going to a prestigious school is like a star high above the sky that is somehow hard to reach. Lack of finances can make someone feel that there's no choice but to settle for less. That it is already the end of their dreams because hope is no longer visible in their situation. But like in any other game, players tend to fail so many times. Every mission has obstacles that will hinder everyone's way. The same as living a deprived life, we may lack opportunities and privileges that most people can have easily, but we shouldn't let that be a boundary for us to reach and dream high. No matter where we stand in society, we can all still lift our head and aim to be the best. Because every star and gem in a game can be redeemed through hard work. Despite having consecutive game overs, it is still not too late to try again and win in the game of life.

References:

Winning at Both the Inner and Outer Game of Success | by Indigo Ocean | Thrive Global | Medium