HANDLING UNRULY CHILDREN

by:

Elena W. Roque

Stubbornness is cute in a toddler but by the time the child reaches school age, this may cause an unruly behavior which leads to problem for parents, teachers and others. When this leads to problem, how would you handle this as a teacher and a second parent to school? The first step in correcting the matter is to admit that our own parenting strategies most likely allowed our kid to become unruly. Find ways how we can help our child behave appropriately. A loving, stable relationship between folks and youngsters is that the basis for the child's healthy social development. Tell your kid you like him and show your love by taking time to pay attention, to play, and to teach. The parent-child relationship is made on the words you say and also the tone of your voice. It is strengthened by the laughter you share and the games you play together. For both teachers and parents, they have to set clear boundaries and stick to them. Meaning that discipline is ruled to a child with a proper setting of boundaries that they can count on in terms of assisting them. A child needs to know the exact behavior expected of him. Child experts tell us that the children actually want boundaries and that once firmly established; most children will respect the rules. Another thing is make a very few threats but carry through on those you do make. If you aren’t ready to make good on a threat, just don’t make it. For parents, spend time with your child. You don’t get to set up activities for each minute of the day, just taking your child along when you run errands or allowing him to do his homework at the kitchen table while you cook creates a feeding of togetherness and may reduce unruly behavior that stems from insecurity. More so, set reasonable punishments that get results. All kids area unit completely different and one kid might respond quickly if the penalization is grounding whereas another may want his allowance reduced. Avoid using chores as a punishment. Children ought to do chores while not pay as a part of being in a very family. Attentiveness and response are the tools for improving your child's behavior. An understanding of behavior modification principles will help you plan your responses to improve behavior. It all comes down to actions and consequences. When a child's action elicits positive reinforcement, it will be repeated over time. When an action elicits penalization, it will eventually be extinguished. Children learn to create the affiliation between an action and its consequence once the reinforcement or penalization is immediate and logically associated with the action. Teachers don't always have to provide the consequence; most consequences occur naturally. Teachers can help make the connection by talking to the child about what they did and why it lead to a certain consequence. But, as teachers, our responses to our learner’s actions are powerful consequences, either rewarding or punishing and therefore, shaping his behavior. In the context of a positive parent-child relationship, the approval of a parent is usually enough of a response to reinforce or punish a behavior. So in this case, we can remanded it from the situation. When more intensive rewards or punishments are needed. To summarize it all, the key is to attend to your child's attitude, moods, and behavior; and then, respond to both good and bad behavior quickly. Learn to recognize when bad behavior is being reinforced or good behavior is being extinguished, and adjust the consequences to turn it around. This requires that we have a tendency to be alert to our kid and build the correct response.

References:

https://www.wikihow.com/Deal-With-Unruly-Children