HELPING LEARNERS TO BECOME ACTIVE AND GOAL - ORIENTED

by:
Gen Miel Carlos - Omania

As a matter of practice, our curriculum is now student – centered that connects the classroom to real – life situations and focuses on comprehension and understanding. As teachers, we should encourage our students to be active learners even in this time of pandemic as much as their learning environment is concerned.

So how do teachers help their students learn to become active and goal oriented? First, encourage them to work on their natural desire to explore, understand and master new things. Second, make activities more meaningful by situating them in real – life contexts. Third, give strategies that help students understand and solve problems in ways appropriate to the situation and improve their learning. Fourth, help them assess their learning and check their understanding and require them also self – reflection in the sense of being aware of one’s own beliefs and strategies. Reflection is very important in light of the national health emergency that our learners could be developed through performance tasks given by the teachers hence, students expressed their opinions. In addition, help keep students understand what they are being taught and have given opportunity to think about what they are doing. Help also our students learn in transfer. This means that learning becomes more meaningful when lessons are applied to real – life experiences. Lastly, let us motivate our learners and be considerate enough thus, they learned best for their performance or class standing even distance learning has been implemented.
References: