Homeschooling is on-trend during the pandemic, where the child stays at home and parents act as a learning facilitator. As a learning facilitator, below are some of the tips that could help you be a good channel of educating your child.

Make an effort to create a schedule that includes age-appropriate educational programs that can be seen online, on television, or over the radio. Consider playtime and reading time as well. Turn daily tasks into opportunities for children to understand. While it is vital to create a routine and structure for learners, you will find that they need some flexibility during these periods. Change up the routine. Switch to a more active alternative if the child becomes anxious and agitated.

Likewise, encourage them to ask you questions and share their thoughts. Ascertain that as a learning facilitator, you are in a secure atmosphere and that your child is free to express himself. Drawings, tales, and other activities may be used to start a conversation.

Don't ignore or dismiss their fears. Recognize their concerns and reassure them that it's normal to be afraid of these situations. Show that you're paying attention by giving them your undivided attention, and make sure they know they can speak to you and their teachers at any time.
