Teaching is one of the most admirable professions. Having a licensed teacher in your family is already considered as to what millennials term, ‘family goals’. Aside from the struggles of completing a four-year course and evaluations from the higher-ups, the pressure of seeing the individual attitude of students during demos are the most nerve-wrecking part of their completion. Becoming a teacher means accepting the flaws of what the future holds once you stand in front of the class and start a discussion. This profession needs a lot of dedication and passion for the students to intake what the teacher says.

However, as much as how praiseworthy it is, the doom side of this work is when your pupils can not grasp what you are teaching. A teacher’s role is to use a classroom as the field for studying and discussing the lessons to provide a question and answer portion afterwards. But the problem begins when the message of the lesson was not delivered clearly or if the students did not able to accept it due to barriers of communication. Keeping the class sessions intriguing is an achievement. Millennials, referring to the children of today’s generation, tend to be more exploratory and questionable of the surroundings, either if it is relevant or irrelevant. Teaching is much more than just executing lesson plans. Because of circumstances that has relations with the conflicts of misunderstood topics in deliberation, teachers began using presentations, models, projectors and such to execute satisfactorily, hoping the pupils will agree truthfully or contradict if they oppose, as a sign of tentativeness. To earn the trust and consideration of everyone, they also started being multifaceted with this profession. Teachers often carry the roles of a class disciplinarian, mentor, counsellor, bookkeeper, role model, planner and many other related roles. Molding the children, teaching them the right and good values will help them to what they will become as ideal men and women in the future.
The roles of teachers nowadays are impressively not quite the same as they used to be. Teachers were once issued a specific curriculum to teach and set of instructions on the most effective method to show it, utilizing similar techniques for all students. But in today’s world, every day is a new battle for them. Counselling, providing a remedial, being the tutor to enhance their knowledge and integrate it to their lives and finally becoming more a mother-like material. The modern methodologies of teaching is entirely essential to students and of course the teachers. The teachers can slowly escape out of their comforting zones and the students will become valuable members of the society.
