Professional golfers, boxers, singers and even dancers follow a specific procedure, unique to them, called routines in order to excel in their performance. They follow the precise same set of movements and activities prior to final performance.

Like a well-choreographed dance, these activities are repeated done dozens of times throughout a course. The best professionals use a set of routine because it helps them eliminate the mental clutter which will interfere with their performance. It frees them to specialize in making their task easier. It’s that important.

Peak performers in every industry, including sports, business, and education, follow routines to specialize in the items that matter most. Students, too, enjoy the utilization of thoroughly taught, well-established classroom routines from the moment they enter the classroom until dismissal. In fact, they're the lifeblood of a successful classroom.

Routines – also referred to as classroom procedure- rid students of distractions that waste time and interfere with learning. Guesswork is minimized. The scholars then are left to specialize in learning. If your students know what to try to and the way to try to do it during transitional or procedural moment of the daily routine, they will more easily attend to what’s most vital. Furthermore, adding more responsibility and purpose may surefire task to boost morale. Well-executed routines also save time and lessen a teacher’s workload.

There should be a routine for everything your students practice in your classroom.
