INSTRUCTIONAL LEADERSHIP: 21ST CENTURY LEADER

Leaders and managers are changed agents, and non-management employees usually resist change. Therefore, leadership is all about action and influence, and not only the titles. Many leaders do not provide leadership and many who do perform leadership do not perceive themselves as leaders.

According to John Maxwell, "The rise and fall of any organization depends on the leader.” The end line in leadership isn’t how distant we progress ourselves but how far we improve and help others. In the principle of biology and law of management, everyone is connected to everyone else. A good leader must know how to empower people by enabling them to perform at their best and by delegating decision-making responsibilities. In every individual for sure don’t care how much you know until they know how much you care.

Moreover, best leaders think first of their people and one does not even know they are in the building, but their influence is in every room. A leader should stand up for what is right and have the courage to advocate for those who can’t advocate for themselves. Leaders are public servant and not who think they are politicians.

As for my own perspective the real measure of patriotism is our level of commitment and participation in preparing our people to have the competencies, knowledge, skills and values which are requisites of international integration. The assurance that future generation of our people will leave productively with honor, dignity and pride in a global community of nations.
