JUST AN INCH AWAY: EMPLOYEES AND HIKERS COMPARED

by:
Roselene M. Silva
ADAS II

Both trekking and hiking require proper training before reaching the zenith. The degree and length of such relentless preparation definitely depend on the difficulty and distance of the incoming challenge.

Similar norm is relevant in the workstation. Every apprentice undergoes on-the-job tasks before a certain position is given. Relatively, the span of duties to be designated to the individual is paralleled to the responsibilities given to him.

This article highlights the lessons that every reader may absorb and may apply to his everyday encounters in life. In the real-world, most, if not all, of the given insights are verified to be part of the experiences of every hiker and, of course, every worker.

The guide needs to take the lead in trekking while the school head needs to manage the totality of the school operations.

Tasks to do and forms to submit in the “now” should be prioritized first. In the workplace, meeting the deadlines is a no joke. Threats are also unavoidable as hikers go into the woods where a member is bitten by an insect or is injured, should be given first aid.

In a positive sense, hikers experience victory after reaching the mountain’s pinnacle as workers felt relieved after a day’s hard word.

The next time you join in a day-hike or an overnight adventure in ridges or peak of a mountain or the next time you hunt for a job, consider the essence of this article as your “starter pack” and share this to your comrades. Workers and hikers are not pole apart but just and inch away with each other.

References:
