The teacher has a good lesson plan laid out for the day. It was well-prepared complete with the instruction materials needed. The teacher has even consulted with a co-teacher ahead of him in experience and knowledge. The supervising teacher checked every part and found each one is good and appropriate. There is one more crucial thing to do for the teacher – to effectively deliver the well-prepared lesson plan to the class.

How can a teacher effectively deliver the lesson he has planned so well and expect that the teaching and learning process will be fully satisfied? Delivery techniques are vital to the process of learning. This should be taken as seriously as when the teacher is planning the lesson. What are the most helpful ways to deliver the lesson which can ensure efficiency and effectiveness?

One good suggestion is before beginning the lesson, the teacher should first establish a conducive environment for learning. Make sure that the room is well-lit, clean, and orderly. Next, calm the learners and allow time for them to settle down. Prepare them to what will transpire for the learning session. Ensure that a good motivation is provided to the learners. Motivational activities can do lots of wonder for the successful delivery of lessons.

Be aware of the individual needs of the learners. Be sensitive of the pacing. The teacher would not want to bore a top student but would not also want to let a struggling student be left behind. That is why it is important that the teacher is sensitive to what is happening inside the classroom while lessons are going on. This will also help so that the teacher will be able to make necessary adjustments if needed.
Keep the energy while maintaining order among the students. How the teacher took off at the start of the lesson should be the same vitality he would display up to the end.
