The perspective of men and women in professional and personal success varies. Each has its own compassion that affects their lives. The way they brought up would somehow sway their intriguing gender differences of what women and men can believe and do. Deciding how to be accessible for work is an ongoing challenge for men and women.

Seeing in survey data that women tend to place more value than men do on individual achievement, making difference, respect from others, and working with a good team in a good environment, but less value on organizational achievement and ongoing learning and development, I realized that these are factual on my own perspective in managing my work and life.

In enjoying work on a daily basis, I beg to disagree that women enjoyed more. Men like me are more dedicated as long as they enjoy whatever job they have. Men are more flexible and easy to adapt to the hostile environment that is why the transition of work is very rare. These prove that passion for work laid for men.

According to Archer, J. (2004), realizing in financial to what personal success means, 0% for women and 12% for men is very much true and correct on my own point of view. Women are more family-oriented than men that having a happy and complete family is more likely to financial success.

As proof, I see to it that when I come home, work is being left in school. I am focused on my role as a father and husband in my family. Seeing my children guided, healthy, performed well in school and God-fearing is very much worthy of what money can give into our lives. I don’t believe in multitasking that doing paper works while spending time with the children and wife. It is somewhat switching from one task to another. Paper works at home will become a stoppage from giving time to family members.

Likewise, Oliver, M. B. & Hyde, J. S. (1993), men have their own perspective differ from women. According to the survey, they gave personal success meaning thru finances. I might say that it is because they are confined to be the breadwinner of the family. But still, 12% is not tolerable because there are women who tend to be the head and breadwinner.

All of these, I now have the intuition of managing my work and my life-family that professional and personal success varies in many aspects. The most important for me is accomplishing what should be done at home and at work. For sure, we cannot serve to masters, but we can do our best to be worthy in the field we chose… in our mission in life to what God wants us to be in His eyes.
