ON CASES OF BULLYING

by:
Michael L. Dionisio

Bullying includes a form of harassment and deprivation on an individual by another person who formulates devices or acts that annoy, mistreat, abuse and even discouragement in any form to someone who is not able to defend himself against these abuses. This form of deviant behavior is well-documented in several television reports and newspaper these past years.

Today, we are hearing from the media various stories of deviant behaviors. The reason why there are kidnappers, corrupt government officials, false preachers of faith and doctrines, and over-pricing in the market is because the people involved extends there deviant behaviors against what is actually normal.

Psychologically, an antisocial deviant wants to be viewed as the dominant. Thus, these antisocial pretensions are really distortions of reality. A bully wants himself to look as if he was feared, honored, or act in a way they wanted to be seen. The victim does not know about this because the deviant person itself hides and is determined to conceal his own personality problems.

There is another fruit of deviance is social deprivation of other people. And it runs in many example. He cannot do anything against it so he instead divert his vengeance to another much powerless individual.

Antisocial personality disorder is a form of deviant behavior that directly or indirect manifests in a person. In their homes, students with APD lack discipline. Sometimes they were vulnerable to brawls, gang war, and petty crimes as well.
Bullying is any consequence wherein a student harasses another student physically, emotionally, and psychologically – (1) parental mismanagement (2) a combination of wrong circle of friends, and (3) invisible social control. These causes, respectively, gave rise to (1) a conception of militancy in which children are so hard-willed against their parents, (2) the absence of goal within his social group, and (3) vicious, distemper, impatience and lack of discipline that few teachers either neglect or tolerate because of fear.

However, there might be a solution with these, when (1) the parents teach their children in early age about good manners and right conduct, (2) the company of right friends, and (3) teacher’s care as well as a therapeutic session with a guidance counselor.

References:
Stop Bullying (2020). What is Bullying. Published at https://www.stopbullying.gov/bullying/what-is-bullying
