We do not know that there are various competencies that a teacher must possess to provide quality education and make learning happen. But, the measurement of when a teacher could be tagged as effective may seem subjective depending on the perception of each stakeholder.

Others may say that the teacher is effective because of the academic background that he/she has while others may believe that he/she is when the children learn.

Analyzing all of the many factors, the list must have a standard instrument for measurement for it to be objective, may it be through the presentation of documents, the pursuit of higher education, observations and evaluations, students’ performances, and many others.

But, seemingly, though lists wouldn’t be presented. Passion towards work is a vital aspect of becoming an effective educator. When a teacher loves what he does, the drive and motivation that he has in teaching will gear towards an effective outcome and accomplishment of our objectives.

Having a heart in everything we do, though tasks seem to be challenging and tedious, we would enjoy teaching well and giving our best shot. If we also have a love for teaching, surely, we would be committed and dedicated to the service of our fellowmen, particularly our learners whom we would want to have what they deserve—quality education.
We may not be the most outstanding, we may not have the highest points in ranking, but if we are passionate, in the hearts of our stakeholders, we are the best educators because we work effectively and efficiently.
