Teachers who are aiming to be promoted to a higher position must bear in mind that a person who uses his mind, plans and performs, resolves and executes will attain success at the end. Instead of whiling his time idly talk, he seizes the opportunity and immediately starts into instant action. A potential teacher-leader may not know everything, but he has a way of gaining knowledge. Instead of which is of engaging in idle chatter, more knowledgeable which is a great help in his bid to the top. But if he has merely about it, nothing will come around does nothing, plans nothing and does not about it, nothing will come out of the preparation.

Those who plan to be a future leader in the education sector must analyze the Nature of the 21st-century leader. He is duty bound to constantly encourage the creation of a future in education.

Future leaders are good workers who concentrate on their assigned task. A motivated professional silently finish his work on time with fewer errors are committed, whereas those who may boast their prowess and their talents are usually the ones to ruin a day of work. Remember that, overconfidence kills a cat.

Aspiring leaders in every field must be ready to consider a broad range of political, economic, social, technological, environmental and other forces as the economics, social, technological and environmental and other forces as they make decisions about what to say and do.

A potential leader must know that a good communication skill is very important for, through it, you can express your ideas and opinions to your co-workers. But idle talks are never a start of effective communication skills. In fact, they hinder the progress of any project. They slow down the tempo of the work. The may be accomplished but at a slow pace and, perhaps, not as excellently as it could be.

As Roscommon, a poet, puts in: "When you begin with as much pomp and show, why end it so little and so slow?" So, when the right time comes, there is no need to tell all that you see the man suited for the position. Show it through performance, not through empty, vain words.
