QUALITY VS. QUANTITY

by:
Ruby B. Salvador

Despite the changing times, education is still imperative for everyone’s growth. In some organizations, quality is sacrificed in lieu of speed and profit. Certainly, this rates an effect on the outcome achieved by the clienteles that soon will create problems in the future.

We cannot erase the fact that there are some of us who want the easiest way out. Like the fast-food industry, they want to make a rush attempt to provide comfort in different fields. However, in this kind of attempt, the quality and purpose of learning is often lost in the assembly-line. Why? Because learning does not appear as it should be.

Quality should always overhead quantity. As all of us believe, education is the root of all successes. If we want to produce graduates who are globally competitive, we should adhere to the standards of the learning process. Limiting materials or lessons taught and the like will create glitches in the education system. Packaged education will never give an individual a meaningful, deep and better learning. Wisdom is earned in due time and not in an urgency.

Sachs (2015) stated that of all of the investments needed to achieve sustainable development, none is more important than a quality education for every learner. In a knowledge-based world economy, a good education is important for finding decent work and achieving good health. It also builds functioning communities, develops the skills to be a dependable parent and eventually become engaged and responsible citizen.

Educators by then should aim to provide a wealth of information to students to widen their horizons. They should aim to produce holistic individuals who are not just capable of doing a certain skill but graduates who are competitive in different areas of work. At the same time, this calls for an eye from the higher authorities to pay attention to what they implement.

References:

Sachs, Jeffrey (2015) How to Achieve a Quality Education for All, Retrieved from https://www.weforum.org/agenda/2015/03/how-to-achieve-a-quality-education-for-all/