ROLES OF TELEVISION AND RADIO IN EDUCATION

by:
Nestle I. Reyes
Teacher III, Bepz Elementary School

Since we are not considering other alternative learning modes in teaching the learners, radio and television may best serve their roles.

Radio and television provide information. These multimedia and teaching tools bestow the learner with the essential materials, facts, data or evidence to learn. Radio and television regularly deliver important facts which are related and relevant to each student’s learning.

Radio and television endow the children with entertainment. The students learn when they feel delighted. The good entertainment the radio and television provide may also appeal to the mind and heart of each student. Learning also takes places after determining the moral lessons and values they acquire after listening and watching.

Radio and television keep the students updated. There are different world and community events that need to be learned by the students. Radio and television tell what are the latest or new in the society.

Radio and television is a way for learning. The sounds, language, stories and events in radio and television make students learn. These things that come from radio and television are indeed educational.

Radio and television develop the talents the students. The music from radio and the actions from television develop the talents of the learners. Radio and television inspire them to release the inner potentials within them.
Radio and television make the students environmentally-aware. The information dissemination and advertisements from radio and television teach the students to take care of the environment. They are being taught to be environmentally-aware and sensitive.

Radio and television make the students socially-sensitive. Radio and television tell what are happening in the society. They teach the students to be aware and concerned in their community and even with society as a whole.

Radio and television keep the students to be responsive. After listening on radio and watching television, the students then may become responsible and responsive. They may also be proactive and do actions for the sake of others.

It is undeniable that radio and television are essential and effective media for learning and they influence and lead the students to be well-informed, well-entertained, updated, learnt, talented, environmentally aware and responsive.

References:
https://blog.byjus.com/role-of-television-in-education/