In the millennium, there are only two things certain in life-death and survival, but there is one other unpleasant certainly and that is criticism. Nobody can escape from criticism. Even successful men and women who have attained the highest phase of moral development are still not free from criticism. Why? Because we are just human.

We are now in the new millennium, the year we have been waiting for is here and the new millennium hug and rumors which we had been fearing are over. A true professional is one who could admit his mistakes is not static nor dormant and must be morally upright. A man being gregarious by nature, he desires popularity, frame and predictability in his work. Who lack professionalism are those who remain stagnant, ford of tete-a tete, negative in attitude, backward and resistant to change in the institution. A real professional does not easily believe in “talks” and would not entertain “intrigues” He/She knows how to accept change and not be a hypocrite. Considering the fact that no man is perfect, we are all inclined to commit mistakes. As mentors, teaching is our professions, therefore it is one of our duties and responsibilities to maintain high standards of personal and professional conduct. Let avoid talking destructively and criticizing the weakness of other people. A person who makes good use of his time, minds his own business, feels acceptable for his work systematizes and organize his activities, as a good leader, morally upright humble, has good public relations and welcomes feedback and constructive criticism is considered a professional.
