There is no doubt in “changes is the only permanent thing in the universe”. However, what is the most noticeable part of change is the transition period or phasing of the changes.

In the education sector, we had been shocked once K-12 has been introduced and in a minimal period of acquiring, the basic of it forced us to implement it right at once. Immediately confusion arises, misleading is everywhere in sight and the rampage of several concerned groups who had taken the implementation negatively at first sprouted so fast. In addition, the learners had nowhere to go but follow at the same time felt anxious on how they will proceed. It was indeed true that those things existed for some reasons. Our education system was far behind compare to the other nations. We cannot say that we are globally competitive when our own product of professionals cannot be considered white-collared workers outside our country because they were lacking of years in basic education. This is primarily the reason why we have to change our basic education curriculum, for us to be globally accepted as professionals. In this way, we can uplift our fellow citizens who were serving in some foreign countries. Although in some areas, we cannot deny that we are lacking in some things like manuals, learning guides and even learning practices. Somehow, as the day goes on we do have chances of improving and coping to the changes, we are struggling with. We can put up systems to help our newly graduates high school students and we can lead them to use their advance studies during their senior high school days. They can be train for some workloads and earn on their own already. We can even give them additional trainings for their improvement. They can even venture in their own business. Furthermore they can widen their aspirations through the challenges they had in that two more added years.

Just a little more trust and confidence we can sort things out again. We are still moving, right? Even we had our fears before we cannot deny the fact that we did never pause even in a second. We even thought of our colleagues that might lose their jobs, our learners to become bored with that added two more years, our beloved parents to get tired of sending their children to school because of the added tuition fees and other school expenses. We just temporarily paralyzed but we did never stop. Fighting is already our legacy.
