THE CHALLENGE IN WRITING A RESEARCH PAPER

One of the most exiting tasks in school is to do a research paper. As Shui L. Kong puts it, “Transmission of knowledge and information to solve everyday problems is a major goal of education.”

In a conceptual dimension, a research paper can be defined as an attempt to seek solutions or answers to problems. It analyzes a perspective or argues a point. (Suny Empire State College, 2017) It is also a work of substance wherein scientific methods are employed in determining the contents and result of the research. Furthermore, the work will not be completed without going into the process of testing hypotheses or verification of theories in support to the arrived answers or solutions. In itself, a research is a form of scientific writing.

It requires time, effort, and dedication to complete a credible research paper. It is imperative that the commitment of the author needs to be 100% in it, for it is the only way to make the work within its intent. Aside from the tedious challenges, the whole experience can be truly fulfilling. Being systematic, analytical and critical in nature, writing a research paper enriches the knowledge and competency of the writer.

As priority, the writer of a research piece should know where he is coming from. The gathering of substantial information must also come into a process of careful scrutiny. The more objective the work is, the more it becomes beneficially useful to its audience, the readers.
A research paper is a scholastic endeavor that leaves marks of empirical undertones. It brings out new ideas that can be embraced by those who seek for knowledge. A research paper once fully completed and qualified is in itself a contribution of the author to readers and research studies in the future.

As an emphasis, when given the opportunity to write one, be sure to put one’s heart into it.
