Leaders are found everywhere. Every social group in our community has a leader. The leader’s main task is to motivate the group’s energy towards the completion of a goal. When we say leadership, it is about directing or motivating people for a certain task. Though everybody believes that the best teacher is experience, leadership and management skills can be learned by reading, taking courses or attending seminars.

In a team, everyone must work together. People have different attitudes, motivations, likes and dislikes. So for a team to act effectively, everyone needs to work together. A good leader is able to rally everyone together so that the team is successful in anything they attempt to accomplish.

Institutions will definitely succeed if there are good leaders in the workforce. That is why each school has an administrator or the officer-in-charge. Attending leadership and management courses/seminars will ensure good leadership techniques and skills are on their grasp.

School heads, leaders/managers are motivated and able to use what they learned to lead others towards success.

Schools need good leaders as well, in the form of teachers. Teachers must be able to motivate the pupils into learning and must be able to take problems and turn them into possibilities to increase learning. If pupils are motivated or excited about the topic at hand, the objectives of the lesson are always at hand.
The task of developing student’s leadership abilities is quite a challenging one for it requires teachers to be leaders in their own right. What makes the role challenging is it requires teachers to instill in the student’s minds that academic excellence is not the be-all and end-all of education.
