THE LEADS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

by:
Reygin S. Roque
Administrative Aide III, Bataan School of Fisheries

Working in the government for 12 years now has given me a lot of good reasons to like it. I may not have the highest salary nor the highest position, the security it gives me and my family is priceless. According to The Balance Careers (2018) being employed in the government provides stability, flexibility, benefits, and time off.

Stability. There is no business offline in the government. The employees are standing on the firm ground. In my case, working in a public school will never be as busy as the jobs in the private.

Security of Tenure. The benefits from the onset of the appointment to retirement are laid out and improving as years passed and so as the change of government. The aid increases but never decreases regardless of one’s performance.

Service for the people. Knowing that the government serves most people (students) coming from the low-income household made my work close to being a public servant at heart.

Family time/ Time off. Being a family man, it is vital for me to render the rest of my weekends and holidays to my wife and kids and obviously I enjoy weekend and holiday off in the government making me ready for the next day of report.
Flexibility. Being a driver and clerk for years is not an issue to being promoted for the higher position as long as you have the willingness to continue studying and acquiring eligibility parallel to the position you want to be in.

Having all of the aforesaid perks, may attract a lot of aspiring job seekers however, they also need to bear in mind that more than those benefits, one should possess: the dedication, sense of responsibility, and the right attitude.

References:

https://www.thebalancecareers.com retrieved: March 21, 2019