THE LIFE OF A TEACHER-MOM

by:

Anjelica G. Recalde, MAEd
Teacher III, Orani National High School Parang - Parang

I love my job, but it’s hard.

Teaching is definitely not an easy profession. While we take the role of a teacher, being a mother at the same time makes it even harder. It’s been a battle for those who have this dual role to perform their duties and responsibilities.

Some might think that being in this field is not a family-friendly thing at all, but once you give your heart, there’s no way that we can’t beat the odds. Indeed, teaching is a complex matter when we are beset with challenges. To uphold this job, you have to be tough enough and be a hero, not to mention that we are dealing with another 200 or more children every time we stepped into the class. We have 200 children whose parents depend on how we will take care of their child. We pack our kid’s lunches yet we help our student’s unpack theirs.

Home becomes an extension of school for paper works or academic tasks. We double our efforts all this time. Despite this, we are subject to missing some of the targets, but have to recharge and catch up to the best of our ability.

We sometimes compromise the time we’re supposed to spend with our children. We are so lucky, if we have kids who understand and will not complain if we missed their school events. It’s really a matter of balancing every now and then. There are times when we rock our baby to sleep, we also think of class evaluation. Student’s poverty is also another story that we also worry somehow. We tend to become emotionally drained if things are not handled very carefully for a lot of factors.
It’s worth being a teacher-mom because we get the chance to positively impact their lives every single day. We may be the best part of their day if they don’t have a good home life with that said, we become neutralizers. Being a teacher-mom really takes a lot of sacrifices comparable to “blood, sweat, and tears to achieve this passion in helping children attain their good future. There are so many wonderful reasons and blessings that come from being a teacher and a mother. Remember teachers, the days are long but the years are short. Little memories remind us of good days.

References:

Peyton, Elizabeth (2017), “10 Things only a Teacher-Mom will understand.” Armstrong Road, Shelton CT.