THE RIGHT TO EDUCATION AS A BASIC HUMAN RIGHT

by:
Raciel Y. Ayson
Teacher I Sampaloc Integrated School

Education is by far the most powerful weapon for personal transformation, and its value is fundamental. Education is now a human right since it is an essential element in the development of inherent dignity and is also crucial in spreading the benefits of learning, understanding, and knowledge. And because of its various social, political, and cultural roles, education has been accorded the realm of a fundamental right. Social rights support the healthy development of an individual being in society. It promotes economic independence because it allows you to work and thus earn a living. Humanity has focused on developing a global progressive community. Hence education is a cultural right. The bottom line is that education is the necessary precondition for functioning as a human being in today's world.

It is unacceptable to deny anyone the opportunity to learn. At the very least, basic and primary education should be free and compulsory. That being said, it must be mandatory for all children to attend primary school. Educational opportunities for technical and professional skills, as well as further education, should be made publicly attainable to all students on the grounds of quality. The educational system must strive to cultivate each individual's maximum potential and encourage respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms.

While educational rights are fundamental human rights, numerous children and young people are marginalized due to extreme poverty. Due to various financial distress, certain families are accused of failing to encourage their children to school. Nonetheless, a large number of fortunate people are born into poor families. And that is because challenges drive them to live the dream and attain their goal.
References: