VIRTUAL CLASSROOMS

by:
Lady S. Lancin
Teacher I, Tipo Elementary School

Virtual classrooms sound good on paper, but there are several factors to it. One blatant factor would be internet connection. This would be the bridge between the advisor and students. As much as we want to provide 1 on 1 education to each student that is not a reality. A sole advisor can't attend to each student individually and do other necessary tasks at the same time.

Let's put it in a scenario where the local governments/schools will be the ones to provide the internet for the students, the next question would be do we have the proper budget for it? Do we choose which students are more deserving to be educated and not? Don't get me wrong virtual classrooms are a great idea, but it's something that will need to be slowly implemented.

It will also require strict discipline because it isn't easy to study in an environment, you're not accustomed to. What do I mean about that? When kids are at school they are known to behave like students. When kids are at home, they consider it a place to relax and have free time. It will take a bit of adaptation for students to get used to the new school environment.

Another key factor to consider is the decrease in social interactions. Instead of being around peers all day you would be locked up in the house like you're on a permanent summer vacation. Parents will need to adjust as well and provide proper opportunities for social interactions for their kids such as social clubs, events and other ways they can think of to keep their kids interacting with others.
With that all said and done, it sounds good on paper but in reality, it wouldn't be something that would be ideal for now. It can be something to consider, but at this point implementing something like this would not turn out well. Not only do we not have the funding capability to accommodate all students, but we also lack the manpower. Let's take it slow and pace ourselves. We'll figure this out together!

References:

https://www.igi-global.com/dictionary/virtual-education/31665#:~:text=Virtual%20education%20refers%20to%20instruction,the%20Internet%2C%20videoconferencing%2C%20etc.