“Teaching is more than a noble profession. It is a vocation, a calling.” – Randall Butising.

A quotation that has been etched into the minds of every teacher. Each word gives encouragement, pride and a reminder that choosing this kind of profession should also come with a burning passion.

Have you ever wonder what is it like to experience the daily life of a teacher? If given a chance to make a vlog about "A day in a life of a teacher" will it become interesting?

This time, I'd like you to like, subscribe, and tap the notification bell to stay updated with what's happening. Now, let me tell you something about teachers.

Once students enter the door of the school, the teacher's responsibility now takes over. The teacher suddenly becomes the parent, the guardian, the nurse, the listener, and some other tasks that usually what other parents cannot do. In many cases, students often share what they feel with their teachers. They share waves of laughter, tears, struggles, problems, and experiences that they can not share with their parents for some rejection issues. For we always know that parents work for the better future of their children, they have lesser time in dealing with some moments with them.

The parents leave their houses at dusk while their children are asleep and go home at night when their children are already sleeping. It is why students are much more connected with their teachers because they are staying at the school when they are full of energy, strength, and fully awake. This is the reason why teachers are also parented not only because they share the discipline of the child, but also they share the love and care to the child.

The relationship between the teacher and learner is beyond the job description. It's more of sympathizing, understanding, supporting, and motivating one another. Schools are considered a second home for the learners and teachers also perceived every child as their brother, sister, son, or daughter. Every morning teachers prepare their different roles on the different jobs they portray in school. They have to make sure everyone feels that they're not being left behind, to share the feeling of belongingness and security as well.

The day will end with beautiful smiles saying "Thank you" and satisfying words such as "I enjoyed the class with you Ma'am/Sir." With those genuine phrases coming from students is a boost of energy to the hearts of the teachers. It serves as fuel to the engine to begin a day with compassion and hope for future learners. While being an educator is deeply rewarding and has some wonderful moments, there's no denying that it is extremely hard work (Lindsay, 2016). Teachers aren't perfect, we still commit mistakes and continue to learn about the different things in life. After a long day of continuing love for teaching, it all ends up with a long deep breath and a job well done while lying on a soft comfortable bed. Thinking about how you end your day, enjoying the sensation of a hard day's work and the fulfillment you feel.

Being a teacher is not just about the job or doing your job professionally, but more of a choice of life and how your passion drives you to move forward as the day passed by. Teachers were called not to get the job done but to touch people's lives for them to live a better life. It is the time when teachers can say "It's a job well done!".

That ends our vlog for today, thank you for watching don't forget to leave a comment and share for more subscribers. Goodbye class! See you on my next vlog!
