We might outline sensible teaching as instruction that results in effective learning that successively suggests that thorough and lasting acquisition of the data, skills and values the teacher has set out to impart. It is not solely about filling your pupils' minds with information, it's also about helping them apply it to their lives. We know for a fact that a new teachers are often limited in their strategies and techniques that is why they really need to be trained to improve their teaching skills. Improving your skills as a teacher takes effort, but once you begin to gain a better understanding of the craft you can implement countless simple measures to increase the effectiveness of your lesson. One of these measures is to reflect on one's own teaching and try to identify what aspects are helpful to pupils' learning and which are not. Most pupils cannot stay focused throughout a lecture. Pupils' attention can be maintained throughout a class session by giving them different activities related to the skills to be developed. Afterwards analyze the activities you have done with a class, be they practical or theoretically based. Note what went well and what may are higher. Another is to apply organizing strategies which include planning, lesson design, time use, advance work and classroom management. Organizing yourself in the right way actually saves time in the long run. Teachers should also bear in mind that they can't teach topics in exactly the same way to all learners and all classes. Every class has different mixture of learners, with different aspects the find difficult. It is the job of teachers to find the best way of teaching the learners they have in front of them. Effective teachers explain things well. They never teach by rote or expect learners to copy down notes which they don't understand. Effective learning happens when teachers are enthusiastic and supportive, pupils are engaged in doing rather than listening, and they interact with the teacher and instructional materials. With all these ideas, teachers would be able to improve their skills and make the teaching and learning situation successful.
