WHAT ABOUT US?

by:
Marivic F. Labrador
Teacher III, Bataan School of Fisheries

The whole world screams about our importance. They even put it in the law. They prioritize us in their talks, discuss, and even furiously debate for what could be the best for us. They even toss everything out just to assure that we will have the best things for us, and this is over the whole wide world.

At this moment that this pandemic, novel coronavirus disease also known as COVID-19, stops us all from our usual life brings so much to our young ones. We need to stay at home, but some of us does not have a home. We are asked to wait for the government to give us support, but others never received any because they do not have any family information listed in their community. Our parents lose their jobs. Some have gone in the skeletal working force. The front liners give way too much, they have the most sacrifices. Those people are our parents. Now, what about us? How could they feed us when they do not have jobs anymore? How can we have our parents back, hug and kiss them back, or just simply see them when they are not allowed to come near us?

Look around you. Have you noticed in every place that there are abandoned children to be found? Are there children you see working in the streets? Did you hear or read news about child prostitution? What about child trafficking? Haven’t you known any of these? Are all these lies? What about those rules and laws intellectual adults made for? What about my rights? Are we still safe? You can not even assure the progress of our education. But you are telling right in front of our eyes that we should not stop studying. How about the other kids who live too far in the mountainous community? Will they get the same as we have? Is mass promotion an answer or an escape?
References:

https://www.humanium.org/en/right-to-education/
https://theaseanpost.com/article/blended-learning-virus-hit-philippines