WHEN DO TEACHERS STOP DREAMING?

by:
Leah D. Policarpio
Teacher III, Sabatan Elementary School

From the moment a teacher-wanna-be stepped in an institution to study, there starts a never-ending dreaming. A young individual, even before becoming a teacher, has pack of dreams already -- for his/herself, family and everyone around them. And once they become one, they start another chain of dreaming because they now begin dreaming for the lives of literally EVERYONE.

Teachers dream for themselves. No one wants to stay a beginner. Everyone dreams of taking new milestones in their career. No one ever dreams of being left behind. No one ever dreams of being stagnant professionally for good.

Teachers dream for their families. They definitely do. They want the best for their children and so they invest in their education and send them to better institutions and mostly, better courses. They do not mind the LOANDON status because investing and dreaming for their families’ better future will eventually give them a life-long fulfilment.

Teachers dream for their colleagues. This is most evident in the old-young generations of teachers. They share their experiences and expertise with the young generation so that they can make better decisions in life. A lot of teachers serve as mentors to their young colleagues and see the latter’s success as their own.

Teachers dream for their students. They envision the future of their students with the hope that they will have brighter future. Every success of a student is a teacher’s trophy. Every failure is a pain to them. Oftentimes, teachers give pieces of advice to their students with the intention of teaching them other life skills besides the lessons that they have to understand. These important skills will lead them to be wiser in their undertakings.

Teachers dream for a better community. The very basic intention why teachers mold the young generation is to help make a better community. Every good person living with one another will make a good community. It is every teacher’s desire to be able to see the realization of all their efforts in correcting the students and teaching them the good values that they should have.

References:
https://www.destinationimagination.org/blog/teaching-students-to-dream-big/