The education sector greatly pursues the continuance of education in our nation despite the presence of this novel coronavirus that makes everything ceased and keeps people stayed at home.

A lot of people bluntly speak they oppose the idea of having the class ongoing even it is in a blended way. They do not like the idea of having a modular study nor have it online. They keep on bugging in social media how hard it will be if the education department will insist to continue this school year. They even counted the number of possible problems and hindrances that may arise through the process. They rant about lack of some essential materials like books, modules, gadgets, internet connection, and even support from the local and national governments. They never utter any word of encouragement. They never gave a chance to see the positive side of the pursuance of the school year. They render so much time to show the disintegration of the education system.

Not even at once, the education sector shows lowliness of the enthusiasm to pursue broke down in the public’s eye. They never let those against to pull them and be with them. It is always as clear as the water; continue. They are very defiant. The way they respond is one of the things to be considered heroic. We really have all those shortcomings and deficiencies. But have they thought that we always do have shortfalls? Have they forgotten that we never had a perfect life after all? So why stop when we can continue and embrace what the present situation is and use what we have for now? We just need to change our mindset and realign the track of our courage.
